

I write to strongly object to the FCC passing regulations that would end the requirement of DSL (and Cable Operators) to offer broadband services independant of any other offering. This means that I should be allowed (and the FCC should support vigourously) the ability to choose which service provider I use for each service. Providers should be required to offer their services seperately as well as bundled. Let market forces choose if bundled offerings are more desirable, not the providers. This type of forced bundling only inflates profits and limits competition in new services, like VOIP, On-Demand Video, etc.
